Then and Now

The problem of meeting the costs of higher education is hardly a new one here in the United States.

Students in attendance at privately conducted colleges and universities actually pay a little less than half of what it costs to educate them; the balance is supplied by the income from endowments and by available gifts. Consequently the institutions must conduct a never-ceasing campaign for funds to meet current expenses. This campaign injures scholastic enterprise in three ways: it makes wealthy donors, normally unfamiliar with the business of education, assume an importance to which they are not genuinely entitled; it creates an atmosphere of advertising which attracts to the campus hordes of the same kind of unfit as swarm to parades in honor of celebrities; and it seldom leaves the school time to grow inwardly at anything like the same pace at which it develops outwardly . . .

The current practice of seeking gifts above all else makes the institution more subservient to givers than ought to be the case. In general, the opinions of wealthy and successful men are not harmful to the college. These involve practical experience, much rugged common sense, and a certain indispensable element of conservatism . . .

Often enough an industrial magnate or a banker serves the community in ways that deserve recognition. But when one confronts the news of college commencements in which the first place is occupied by doctorates conferred honoris causa upon a series of aldermen and sausage manufacturers, one can guess fairly accurately that the explanation is not really service but "contributions." How can any school expect its students to interest themselves in scholarship, scientific research or the genuinely academic professions when the men it applauds, year in and year out, have no other title to greatness than the fact that their signature on "the dotted line" is authentic and dependable?

—The Commonweal, June 29, 1927

The small group of learned colleagues that once made up the university is no more. Modern enrollments, expenses and objectives have made bureaucracy the characteristic organization of modern universities, administered by professional executives acting in accordance with the desires of political, industrial, alumni and student bodies. It is rare that administrators or the sources of administrative power limit academic freedom by some dramatic dismissal of a professor. Often, less noticed but more effective limitations are accomplished through the altering of employment practices, standards, budgets, salaries and curricula—limiting academic freedom by limiting academic responsibility. An administrator may not refuse to incorporate a sequence of teacher training courses if the legislature sees the need for it, disproportionately develop carbon electives within the chemistry department if a local industry promises a grant, or build a huge athletic organization if the alumni desire it.

It is by these and similar measures, some highly necessary, some highly commendable, that academic responsibility is lessened. Meanwhile, the small group of colleagues has become a large number of employees. The new academic world is their world and they have adjusted to it, for it is their livelihood. They may rise up at a dramatic abridgement of academic freedom, but they are participants in the loss of academic responsibility. Increasingly, theirs is the life of the salaried employee more than that of the curious, disciplined scholar.

But with all of this, the search for fundamental knowledge is continued by some members of the faculty. In the physical and biological sciences, this search has been accepted as necessary for the obvious utilitarian results that have emanated from it. Perhaps even the quest for and communication of physical and biological truth is viewed as good in itself.

—Lawrence Podell in The Commonweal, January 25, 1957
